

Way to Amazonia 26

While Eva was struggling with her disappointment in Amazonia, Snowdyke and her general feeling of exhaustion, the woman who had pointed out Snow's whereabouts found out that something was horribly wrong. Eva had used the wrong link to Snow! In her eagerness to regain her wild, free and strong self she had assumed the first link to be the right one. But she didn't know there were more links to Snow, as many links as there were women, as there were frames of mind. Eva's tired and depressed state of mind had evoked the link to a Snowdyke she loathed but one that fitted closely to the way she saw the world at present. She was so desperately in search of the wild and the gorgeous, a sparkle to relight her fire, that her otherwise so keen mind hadn't noticed the mistake.

The woman alarmed the other eurosapphites at once and a palaver was held. There must be some way to re-link Eva to her true Snowdyke. Messages were send to warn her and she was asked to find a spot where she could relax enough to conjure up the image of the Snowdyke she longed for: the demanding, smelly, lustful and strong hairy creature that had once over-powered her and abducted her to the dark stinking cave. Only then the right connection could be established.

Of course, the eurosapphites did not combine their forces to help Eva out of pure altruism: a new encounter of Eva and Snowdyke would please lots of women lurking in the shadows of the net.
